Passage 1

questions (No.11 to No.15) that follow. The answers (in no more than 10 words) should be written after the corresponding numbers on the Answer Sheet.

Researchers in Japan and Australia said they had made progress in developing a blood test that could one day help doctors identify who might get Alzheimer's disease. The scientists said the test can recognize a protein known as amyloid(淀粉样蛋白) beta, which other studies had linked to Alzheimer's. They said it was correct more than 90 percent of the time in a study involving over 370 people. The findings were published in the journal Namre.

Alzheimer's disease is the most common form of dementia(痴呆). Experts believe dementia affects close to 50 million people worldwide. By the year 2050, it is expected to affect more than 131 million people. Those numbers come from Alzheimer's Disease Intemational, a non-profit group. Currently, doctors have two ways to identify a buildup of amyloid beta in the brain. One is a brain scan or brain imaging; the other is a spinal tap(脊椎抽液). But both tests are invasive, costly and may only show results when the disease has already started to progress. There is no treatment that can slow the progression of Alzheimer's. Current drugs can only ease some of the effects of the disease.

Having a simple, low-cost blood test could make it easier for drug companies to find enough people who are at risk of developing Alzheimer's to test new medicines, said Katsuhiko Yanagisawa. He was one of the leaders of the study. He works at the Japanese National Center for Geriatrics and Gerontology.

Alzheimer's disease is thought to start developing years before patients have any signs of memory loss. Expefis say an important factor in finding an effective treatment will be the ability to recognize signs of the disease early. "You have got to walk before you run," said Colin Masters, a co-leader of the study and a professor at the University of Melbourne in Australia. "You have to learn to diagnose the disease directly before you can hope to see the effect of therapeutic intervention. And that's where the real value in this test will come," Masters added.

11. This passage reports the development of a _____ test to diagnose Alzheimer's disease.

12. One advantage of the present test is that it costs _____ than the previous tests.

13. All the three tests identify Alzheimer's disease by detecting a protein named _____.

14. Can doctors cure or slow down the progression of Alzheimer's disease today?

_____.

15. Alz:heimer's disease may have already started before patients have any signs of memory _____.

Passage 2

Directions: Read the following passage. After reading it, you should give brief answers to the 5 questions (No.16 to No.20) that follow. The answers (in no more than 10 words) should be written after the corresponding numbers on the Answer Sheet.

A friend told me an experience she had in the hospital. As she lay terrified on the wheeling bed being rolled towards the operating room, a male orderly(勤杂工) appeared by her side and quietly took her hand. He walked beside her all the way. Her terror became less intense. When they reached the operating room, he gently put her hand down and she was rolled in. She was still terrified, but the feeling of being cared for filled more of her mind than her fear.

When she awoke in her room, the surgery successful, all she remembered was that hand in hers and the safe and cared-for way she felt at that time.

"I don't remember the color of his skin or anything about him," my friend said gently, "but I'll always remember the act of compassion."

My friend will remember that act long after she has forgotten most of the events in her life. This small act of comfort shows the orderly's ability to open his heart to others. The orderly in my friend's life opened himself to her and she will never forget him.

You do not need to hug everyone you meet, but your heart can be open. You do not need to talk to every stranger, but your heart can be open. Openness to others as you would like to be open to is love. Can you live with an open heart, even while others are frightened? Love is not taking advantage of the weaknesses of others. It is making the needs of others as important as your own. Love is like a fire that is out of control. Once lit, it cannot be contained. You may strive for moderation(适度,节制) in diet, exercise, and work, but striving for moderation in love is like striving for moderation in breathing. Practice moderation in all things except love.

16. How did my friend feel as she lay on the wheeling bed?

_____.

17. How did she feel after the orderly took her hand?

_____.

18. What did the orderly's small act of comfort show about him?

_____.

19. Love is not taking advantage of the weaknesses of others, but making _____.

20. The last paragraph asks us to _____.
