It used to be rare for people to live to 100. But babies born in the US today can hope to live that long. In the 20th century, life expectancy in wealthy nations increased by as much as 30 years. Average life expectancy for Americans is 78. But doctors are seeing people adopt bad habits that can cut their lives short, such as eating too much fast food, exercising too little and smoking cigarettes. These habits increase the risk for cancer, heart disease and stroke.

Researchers at Harvard University and the University of Washington wanted to find out how many years are lost with these lifestyle choices. They found that high blood pressure, smoking and overweight account for five years of loss of life expectancy in men and about four years in women at the national level. The researchers broke the data into race, income and location, and they found even greater differences. Middle-income whites have the best blood pressures. But Asian-Americans have fewer bad habits and the best health. They are not getting heart disease because of low blood pressure. They are not getting cancer because they have low risk factors for cancer, including smoking.

Passage 3

Borrowing to start a business is not easy. Getting a bank loan, particularly for a new small business, is like going through the eye of a needle.

Banks favor established business people with a solid credit rating and a large bank account. They should also have experience in the business they propose to enter, and offer well-prepared business plans that show the ability to repay the loans. If you are not such a person, then you need to double your preparations to convince the banker to lend you that much needed start-up capital. If your business is new and small, bankers will need to know as much as possible about you and your business.

However, many small business owners often make the mistake of not being well prepared when going to the bank to apply for the loan. Surprisingly, many loan applicants don't even have the slightest idea how or when they intend to repay the money they request. Often they don't even know how much money they need. When asked how much money they want to borrow, many people give these two common responses: "How much money can I get?" and "As much as possible." Is it any wonder that lenders say no?

Therefore, the key step before requesting a loan is to thoroughly prepare before you ask for a loan.

26. The underlined sentence in paragraph 1 means getting a bank loan is _____.

27. What kind of people do banks prefer to give a loan to?

_____.

28. If your business is in the start stage, why do you need to be well-prepared?

_____.
